

The Piece That Defines the Room

Furniture and lighting with a distinctive presence

A table, cabinet, chair, or light can become the starting point for an interior, guiding its proportions, materials, and atmosphere.

HIGH POINT, NORTH CAROLINA / FALL 2026

Sometimes an interior begins with a single object. A cabinet establishes its scale. A table introduces a sculptural line. A chair suggests a material palette. At Collected by Schwung, these pieces offer designers a tangible starting point for the rooms they create.

The collection brings together furniture and lighting with a strong visual presence, from carved wooden case pieces and expressive seating to tables with unusual bases and chandeliers with distinctive silhouettes. During Fall High Point Market 2026, visitors are invited to consider how such objects can influence the space around them.

A prominent piece does more than occupy a central position. Its proportions can guide the arrangement of nearby furniture; its surface can introduce contrast; its lines can find quieter echoes elsewhere in the room. The effect may come from an expansive form or from a detail that becomes apparent only on approach.

Lighting also belongs within this conversation. The lamps and chandeliers in the Collected by Schwung assortment contribute shape and atmosphere, becoming part of the composition both when illuminated and in daylight.

The showroom presents these possibilities through combinations of furniture, art, and accessories. An antique cabinet can provide a setting for contemporary ceramics. A substantial table can be balanced by visually lighter chairs. A sculptural light can draw attention upward and alter the perceived proportions of a setting.

For designers and collectors, the starting question is personal: which object deserves to lead? Collected by Schwung offers a place to encounter that piece and begin imagining what might follow.
