

Small Objects, Personal Interiors

The art of the finishing touch

From sculptural heads and architectural fragments to vessels, books, and candlesticks, smaller objects give interiors an individual identity.

An unexpected object invites a closer look.

Small Objects, Personal Interiors

HIGH POINT, NORTH CAROLINA / FALL 2026

A room's most revealing details are often the ones encountered at close range: a small sculpture on a shelf, a carved fragment beside a book, or a candlestick whose surface rewards a second look. These objects bring another scale of experience to an interior.

At Fall High Point Market 2026, Collected by Schwung invites designers to explore this quieter part of its collection. Alongside substantial furniture, the brand gathers decorative accessories, original artworks, vessels, books, and curiosities that offer opportunities for personal expression.

Their significance comes partly from placement. A sculptural head can introduce a human presence to a bookcase. An architectural ornament can bring the detail of a larger structure into an intimate setting. A group of vessels can establish a relationship between different heights, shapes, and surfaces.

Selection is equally important. Objects do not need to share a period or origin to belong together. A repeated curve, a sympathetic color, or a contrast between rough and polished surfaces can provide a visual connection while allowing each piece to retain its identity.

The mailings and showroom presentations of Collected by Schwung reflect this attention to detail, placing smaller discoveries within the wider context of an interior. For designers completing a project, these pieces offer a way to develop the room beyond its principal furniture.

For collectors, they also provide an accessible starting point: one object chosen for a particular quality, followed over time by others. The resulting arrangement becomes a record of attention, interest, and individual taste.
